Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: . news, too, from the seat of war was far from reassuring; not that they could have heard as yet of Philip s arrival, but each mail brought less hopeful accounts; sickness and death were busy in the camp and in the fleet, carrying off hundreds, both at sea and land, who had gone out full of high aspirations, hoping at least, if they must yield their lives, to lose them in the battle, doing service for their Queen and country. Mrs. Bowen seldom now read the papers, and Captain Bowen often sat an hour gloomily looking into the fire when he had finished reading the paper, and had seen the names of many officers whom he had known well during his own life in the army, now suddenly cut down, and their career of glory and honour ended. Poor Sylvia watched the post eagerly, longing to be the first to bring the glad tidings of Philip s safe arrival at the port: every morning when breakfast and prayers were over, she flew down the long avenue regardless of wind or weather to meet the postman at the gate and take the letters from his hand; but up to this time she had been unsuccessful. Frank began to fear that he would have left home before the long-looked-for news had arrived, while Gilbert secretly rejoiced at the delay, hoping to be out of reach of the home eyes and questions, should Philip in any way attack...
