But it just grew foggier and foggier, till finally I got really mad. I knew anybody could write a thing like that, and that was why I did it--to prove it, you see. Some of the lines aren't quite so smooth as the others, but it's pretty good, I think! And I proved what I set out to, that you can write poetry without in the least knowing what it's all about. Ye-es, I returned doubtfully. Naturally, one hesitates to accept such a startling theory of criticism without a little consideration. Only, Ethelwyn added thoughtfully, it had one result that I hadn't in the least foreseen. And that? Why, that I'm perfectly wild to know what I meant myself. June 20. I brought home my last armful of daisies to-night. Eight times I've filled the old glass pitcher with them, by which I know that I've counted a month of summer days. These last, though I hunted far for the youngest ones, have grown old and weary; they no longer have strength to climb above the hurrying grasses. The days are growing quieter too; there are bird-songs still, but no more of the sweet, irrepressible tumult with which meadow and woods have been ringing for two months past; the hour of magic madness is gone; the world by contrast seems strangely tame and middle-aged. Our life has followed the course of nature and sobered down considerably of late....
